Of my poor boy; and gave with many a prayer A little favourite Bible to his care, And bade him keep and read it for my sake, The last best gift a mothers love could make. --Then, sir, I gave him up to God; and forth He went, to bless my eyes no more on earth. Excuse these tears; they give my heart relief; And God forbids not unrepining grief. The very Saviour wept when He was here; And nature claims the comfort of a tear. I would not strive against my Fathers will, Nor reckon aught that comes from Him an ill; But ah! I felt, I feel the chastening rod! And it smote hard though in the hand of God. Five years went by, nor heard I of his fate. --At last, one night, a man came to my gate, A war-worn veteran, but of aspect mild, Who brought, he told me, tidings of my child. Sir, I must weep, my feelings must have vent. --This man had marched, had slept in the same tent, With my boy Richard. He had been his friend, And shared his toils and dangers to the end. He was a Christian and a man of prayer, Who loved his God, and served Him everywhere. My wanderers follies he had seen with pain, And warned him from them kindly, but in vain; Yet joined he not the common laugh and jeer, Nor mocked the precepts he refused...
